During the gold mining boom in the early 19th century, a small number of explorers and fur traders came to the West Coast of Canada. The gold diggers went up the Fraser River to Hope Town. The narrow and towering rock cliffs and the impact of the rough river water increased the difficulty of gold mining, and also caused a large number of salmon to be blocked by the rapids during their migration, but it was still a place full of hope in everyone's hearts. In the early 20th century, the Pacific Railway built a tunnel upstream of Hell Gate, causing a huge landslide to fall into the river above, increasing the water depth by five meters and increasing the water velocity. This landslide also caused environmental changes. We can take a cable car (cable car) over the steep rock wall to see the rapids and unforgettable landscapes.
